Successful living means functioning well in love and work, declared Sigmund Freud. Yet most Zen teaching derives from a monastic tradition that is far removed from the ordinary world of romantic and sexual love, family and home life, ordinary jobs and careers. Few Western students of Zen live apart in traditionally structured monastic communities.

As a Zen master might say, if you seek inner peace you won't be able to find it, but the act of giving up the idea of such a reward in itself – and focusing instead on others' happiness – creates the possibility for lasting peace. This is truly the spiritual dimension of Zen. On the everyday level, Zen trains the mind to achieve calmness.

Zen schools are more or less divisible into those that emphasize a curriculum of verbal meditation objects — like koans — and those that do not. Emphasizing daily life practice as zazen, Soto Zen centers generally do not work with a set koan curriculum and method, though koans are studied and contemplated.
